STAGE 2 - THEM BOOTS WERE MADE FOR BURNING by Mean Matt McCord

(Well)

Yosemite Sam is a spy for the Confederate army, assigned to the regiment commanded by General Robert E. Lee. General Lee has sent him on a potentially dangerous mission. Scouting reports have confirmed that Union General Stonewall Jackson has led his army south into Virginia, and have set up camp not far from General Lee's position. Yosemite Sam's orders are to sneak into the enemy camp and determine their military plans.

Since General Jackson has posted sentries all over the perimeter, sneaking into camp on foot is next to impossible. So Yosemite Sam decides to tunnel his way in. However, since Yosemite Sam is not the world's best judge of distance, he tunnels completely under and past the Union Army encampment. When he digs himself back to the surface, he realizes, much to his dismay and disgust, that he has tunneled way past the Mason-Dixon Line, and is now in NEW YORK CITY!

He tries tunneling under the wall, climbing the wall, pole-vaulting over the wall, chopping through the wall. He even tries dressing as a southern belle, complete with a dress, makeup, and a wig, hoping to charm his way in. All of it is to no avail. The only things he finds are a pile of half-eaten carrots, a hole in the outer wall of the jail just big enough for a rabbit to squeeze through, and a note.
